Collins and Murkowski had proposed cutting $800 million from Medicaid funding over nine years so that states could adjust rates and enrollees. At the time, those changes were seen as essential to health care and as an important piece of the health insurance reform package passed by Congress.. The survey conducted by research firm IDC found that only 29 percent of Americans ages 18 and older wanted to leave the United States for Europe in 2016 as compared to 55 percent who wanted to move to Europe just a year earlier. And while millennials may be moving to Europe from the United States because of the economic problems on both sides of the pond, they're also not moving because they want to find a new home.. One reason for that may be the fact that the majority of millennials (54 percent) say they're looking for a job that pays a decent wage. In addition to this, 56 percent of Americans ages 18 and older report that they want to buy a house, while 34 percent think they are considering leaving the United States to return to college.. If Republicans fail to get health coverage, insurers would be on the hook for any outages or increases in premiums. And if insurers could no longer charge people less than they were before, prices would have to go up for other healthy enrollees. The bill doesn't address how states would handle what they lost.. The number of people who said they'd likely move to Europe dropped to 22 percent between last year's July survey (when 23 percent said they'd likely go) and this December's survey. The trend line for this category holds pretty steady, with 27 percent of millennials planning on making the jump of 2018 versus 17 percent of Americans that said they want to move this year.. It's not just millennials who are coming back to Europe. A whopping 62 percent of 17-to-34-year-olds who lived in the United States between 2005 and 2011 told IDC that.
